LANGUAGE DEVELOPMENT AND ASSESSMENT OF BI-/MULTILINGUAL MALAYSIAN CHILDREN Convener: Yap Ngee Thai Universiti Putra Malaysia, Malaysia *ntyap@upm.edu.my SYMPOSIUM ABSTRACT: Bilingualism and multilingualism in Malaysia are often reported as the norm rather than the exception. Hence, an understanding of language development norms and best practises in the development of assessment tools to track the development trajectory of Malaysian children is an important research direction as past studies have shown that bilingual and multilingual children do not necessarily follow the monolingual trajectory. In line with such effort, this symposium brings together four studies that examine the development of tools to access phonological processing, receptive and productive vocabulary, morphological knowledge, and structural knowledge of Malaysian children. The first paper reports work done in the development of the Malay Cross-linguistic Lexical Task and subsequent adaptation to measure receptive and productive vocabulary knowledge in Malaysian English. The second paper introduces a speech sound discrimination test that is language neutral to assess phonological processing for bi-/multilingual children, addressing the need for equitable diagnostic tools that minimize linguistic bias. The third paper presents findings on comprehension and production of Malay derivational and inflectional morphology in Malay-speaking children with Developmental Language Disorder (DLD), shedding light on morphological development challenges and their diagnostic implications. The final paper presents local language assessment tools that assess structured language such as the standardized Malay Preschool Language Assessment Tool (MPLAT) and the Multilingual Sentence Repetition Task, as well as tools for assessing spontaneous language use for the purpose of language profiling such as the Malay Language Remediation and Screening Procedure (Malay-LARSP) and the Mandarin LARSP. Together, these studies highlight the evolving landscape of language assessment tool development in the Malaysian context and the complex relationship between language exposure, grammatical knowledge and cognitive processing. The symposium aims to stimulate discussion on assessment innovations and language development norms of Malaysian children with different bilingual and multilingual profiles. Keywords: language development; language assessment; bilingualism; multilingualism Themes: Language and Cognition

THE MALAY CROSS-LINGUISTIC LEXICAL TASKS (MCLTS) AND THE MALAYSIAN ENGLISH CLTS: LESSONS FOR ASSESSMENT INNOVATIONS

ABSTRACT

The Malay Crosslinguistic Lexical Tasks (MCLTs) and the Malaysian English version (MECLTs) are picture naming and picture identification tasks that assess receptive and expressive knowledge of single-word nouns and verbs in Malay and Malaysian English. The MCLTs were developed following criteria to ensure that the tasks are comparable to other language versions initiated by Ewa Haman and Magdalena Łuniewska, with Polish and British English among the earlier versions developed. This paper will discuss the steps taken in the construction of the Malay CLTs and subsequent adaptations for the Malaysian English version. The construction of the MCLT involved two preparatory study: a picture naming study using the CLT picture database and a subjective age of acquisition (AoA) survey for words obtained in the picture naming study that was conducted with adult Malay native speakers. Careful selection of culturally and developmentally appropriate vocabulary items, drawing on data from the AoA survey, semantic category, and complexity information about the identified nouns and verbs in Malay. The final version is then ready to be pilot-tested with 4-6-year-old children. The Malaysian English version (MECLTs) was constructed using a different set of criteria used for adaptation from an existing version: the British English version. The paper will present findings from data collected with Malaysian children for both the MCLTs and the MECLTs. Implications for future innovation and adaptation of the MCLTs and MECLTs for further research and clinical assessment of children in Malaysia will be discussed.

ABSTRACT

Phonological processing is fundamental to word learning in children, yet there is a lack of standardised, criterion-referenced tools for assessing these skills in bi-/multilingual children. This project addresses this gap by developing a speech sound discrimination test suitable for children from diverse linguistic backgrounds, including Malay, English, and Mandarin. Unlike existing assessments, the test is designed to minimise language bias and account for phonological overlap across languages. The test battery, consisting of the newly developed speech sound discrimination test and the Crosslinguistic Nonword Repetition Test (Chiat et al., 2020), was piloted with 30 university students from various language background. Following that, it will be validated with 60 typically developing preschool children aged 5 to 6 years 11 months, alongside the Malaysian English Crosslinguistic Lexical Task (Lew et al., 2025). We hypothesise that phonological processing abilities of bi-/multilingual children will predict their English vocabulary outcomes, and that the test will demonstrate a high internal consistency. Findings will provide preliminary evidence for the validity of the newly developed speech sound discrimination test. This new tool could inform early identification of language learning difficulties in multilingual contexts, where appropriate standardised assessments are limited.

BIODATA

As a psycholinguist and speech-language therapist, Dr Soon Tat Lee is fascinated by the cognitive and linguistic mechanisms involved in bilingual language processing, particularly how bilinguals acquire, comprehend, and produce words in the languages they speak. Additionally, he has a strong passion for language testing and test validation. Much of his current work focuses on developing language tests that assess specific language constructs in understudied language pairs such as Malay-English and Mandarin-English, and conducting language experiments using these tests to investigate the relationships between different aspects of language knowledge. The greater purpose of this work is to develop evidence-informed assessments with a practical impact for both researchers and practitioners to enhance language learning in multilingual contexts, including those with learning difficulties.

MORPHOLOGICAL DEVELOPMENT IN MALAY CHILDREN WITH DEVELOPMENTAL LANGUAGE DISORDER: A STUDY ON AFFIXATION SKILLS

ABSTRACT

This study investigates the morphological development of children with Developmental Language Disorder (DLD) who are native speakers of Malay and, more specifically, their ability to understand and produce affixation. As Malay is an agglutinative language, affixation represents a fundamental component of word formation, including both derivational and inflectional processes. Adopting a cross-sectional design, this study consisted of two matched groups: 15 children aged 7;0-9;11 years who were diagnosed with DLD and 15 typically developing children. The children's comprehension and production of noun, verb, and adjective affixes were assessed in the study. Findings reveal that although children with DLD have relatively good comprehension of derivational and inflectional affixes, they have marked difficulty with the production of inflectional verb affixes. The difficulties in production are most probably related to the complexity of phonological interaction between roots and affixes, as well as the intricate morphological rules governing Malay affixation. The study contends that these difficulties are the result of the limited cognitive processing capacity that is commonly observed in children with DLD. Overall, the study contributes to a more refined understanding of morphological acquisition in atypical language development and highlights the need for more precise language assessment tools and interventions. The findings have important implications for the assessment of Malay language proficiency in the Malaysian educational context, particularly for children with language impairment.

LANGUAGE ASSESSMENT TOOLS FOR CHILDREN AT RISK OF LANGUAGE DISORDERS IN MALAYSIA

Rogayah A Razak

UCSI UNIVERSITY, Malaysia

ABSTRACT:

Early identification (EI) and intervention programs (IP) for children at risk of speech and language disorders are crucial for successful speech and language outcomes and subsequent school performance. About 10% of children under 15 years old in any population have a disability. Malaysia has more than 850,000 children with disability, and at least one-third of them are severe and require rehabilitation (Amar, 2023). In this presentation, we are going to talk about local language assessment tools – tools that assess structured language and spontaneous language. The former are the standardized Malay Preschool Language Assessment Tool (MPLAT), and the Multilingual Sentence Repetition Task, while the spontaneous speech is assessed through the language profiling tools, i.e., the Malay Language Remediation and Screening Procedure (Malay-LARSP) and Mandarin LARSP, respectively. These tools are tools that can be used in early identification and intervention programs. They are culturally and linguistically appropriate tools to assess children in Malaysia. We will demonstrate the use of these tools MPLAT in describing the language abilities of children with dyslexia, developmental language disorders (DLD), and children with hearing impairment using cochlear implant.
